This pacing guide reflects the lesson plans that I complete in my AP English Literature class, in general. Obviously, I switch things up and add or subtract lessons as needed. It also reflects how to use the materials in my Full Course Bundle, available for purchase on TpT. My full course bundle includes more than you could use in an entire year. You are not a bad teacher if you don't do it all. I don't do it all! I've laid out the year to include as much as possible, but you can substitute or eliminate activities of your choosing. Note that changes, especially in novel or play units, will affect the dates they are being taught. Please find the individual unit plans in the bonus files of your download to customize your own pacing guide. If you don't use the long fiction units in this pacing guide but would like access to the poetry, writing, and short fiction materials, check out the AP Lit Starter Kit as well!

Note #1: I've laid out this pacing guide for 45-50 minute lessons.

Note #2: In this model, I use the poetry term bellringers as a full lesson done each week. You can also do one bellringer question per day, lasting throughout an entire week. Since I do literary term bellringers, vocabulary quizzes, and voice lessons as bell work as well, I prefer the full lesson approach.

Day	166-180
Suggested Activities	The way you end your year depends very much on your school calendar and the expectations of your school. Some school years, like mine, end just after the AP Exam. We only have a few days to kill before our finals week, so we do film analysis of a movie. Others have 6-8 weeks after the exam, so they continue studying literature or use this time to write other types of essays, such as literary theory, compare/contrast, or college essays. When I used to be on a different school calendar, we had 3-4 weeks after the exam to spend. We used this time to get into literature circles and studied a play, a different one for each group. You can read more about this idea on my website here. In the final days of school, be sure to roll out summer reading with incoming AP Lit students, if your school desires.
